William Colby began his intelligence career during World War II as an OSS officer who parachuted into Nazi-occupied Europe. After the war, he rose through the CIA ranks, oversaw the coup against President Diem in Saigon, and ran the controversial Phoenix Program. But after decades of obediently taking on the White House's toughest and dirtiest assignments and rising to become Director of the CIA, Colby landed in hot water for breaking with the agency's history of limited disclosure and revealing to the U.S. Senate's Church Committee some of the agency's darkest, most tightly held secrets and extra-legal operations.

Perhaps because America has a special fascination with the CIA, or perhaps because Colby seemed genuinely bothered by the CIA's excesses, his decision to cooperate with the Church Committee's investigation cost William Colby his job but might have saved the agency.

After the screening, Colby's son Carl, the movie's Director and Producer, and the Brennan Center's Chief Counsel, Frederick A.O. Schwarz, Jr., who was Chief Counsel to the Church Committee, will discuss the unique challenges inherent to intelligence oversight.
